> It was the kind of day that made Del Santianni feel as if he was moving in slow motion, even though he was riding along at sixty-five miles an hour on the Newport Freeway. In his white police-issue helmet and stiff black boots, he was sure the temperature had risen above the projected ninety-three degrees.

> Dry heat was better than humidity, he thought philosophically. And any perspiration that was generated by the weather and his required gear quickly evaporated as he guided his motorcycle in and out of the afternoon traffic.

> He grinned to himself. It wasn't all that long ago that he had been counting the months until he was legally old enough to legally ride a motorcycle. Now he couldn't wait to stop riding and try find his best friend Sirius Black. Suddenly He saw a large black blur go by him. That vehicle is going at least eighty-five.

> The audacity of some people never ceased to amaze Del. He hadn't hidden himself behind a sign on a lonesome highway with nothing but empty miles stretching out before the motorist. Del was zipping along on his motorcycle, all six foot four of him, a sight hardly missed. The motorist had to have seen him as he shot by. Either the driver didn't care if the police saw him speeding or it was well worth the risk.

> Well, Del would find out soon enough. Flipping on the hypnotic blue and red lights Del went through motions that were second nature to him now. Considering the heavy fine levied for going an estimated twenty miles over the speed limit, the black blur's driver had to be in one hell of a hurry.

> When Del finally got up to the black blur he motioned for the driver to pull over. Only then did he realize who was driving the huge black motorcycle, "Sirius what the hell are you doing?" Del yelled at his friend. "Well, if you look behind me you'll find my reason." Del looked and found Sirius' girl friend behind him. Sirius' girlfriend was VERY pregnant. "Get going NOW!" Del said "I will personally escort you," with that they sped off to the hospital.

> In the waiting room, Del questioned Sirius. "How did this happen?"
" Hey don't look at me like that... It's her fiance's fault I just brought her here I had nothing to do with this." Sirius said. "His name is Alan"

> Please don't kill me I know it's short this is only part 1 or 2 or 3.
